No further movement of the military from the city has been made and several detachments of those here have been set to work again—an arrangement which is immediate in its effects for good. Even furloughs have stopped for the nonce, except in cases of known necessity and today will probably pass also without seeing the departure of more troops.

Colonel Anderson is still of the opinion that as yet it is unsafe to make any change in the protective policy adopted and the experiences of yesterday tend to confirm him and others in the belief that it is the bayonet and the musket which are keeping in repression the fuss-makers. Practically no disorder of a serious sort was reported and only here and there at intervals few and far between could it be told that there was anything unusual at all. The law and court decisions with reference to boycotting in Virginia are plain, and Mr. Royall thinks he has a good case for his clients. He proposes to press it as vigorously as the rules of the courts will permit, and when it comes to trial it will doubtless be of great interest to the public.

Clear Statement.

The testimony of Mr. Macrone was the most important, and carried with it a clear statement, while that of Mr. Patram was equally as calm and bore the stamp of conviction.

In a number of instances there was apparent conflict, that of the men who were arrested with Taylor being particularly so. One of them, Bass, distinctly stated that none of the party had been drinking, while the statement of Clem-

Mr. Page's Intentions.

Commonwealth's Attorney Page was present at the hearing on behalf of the Commonwealth. In many of his questions it was apparent that an effort would be made to prove that the soldiers who figured in the incidents that led up to the shooting were themselves intexicated and went beyond their power in shooting Taylor.

Some of the jurymen questioned witness in this particular, and some of the witnesses took occasion to say that they had observed some of the soldiers in a an injection of camphor-catteine.

Striking Contrasts.

A general feeling of relief, marked the beginning of the day in Rome yesterday owing to the widespread belief that though the Pope's days are numbered, his hour has not yet come. The news of yesterday's operation sent cardinals and ambasadors driving hurriedly to the Vatican. The sombre black carriages and horses of the former, relieved only by glimpses of the scarlet robes worn by the pale-faced occupants, contrasted strangely with the brilliant equipages of the ambassadors. Outside St. Peter's, the ordinary visitors hurried past the Swiss guard and ascended the stalrease leading to the inner court of the Vatican.

The sun beat fercely on the plain white shutters which shelter the Pope's room, and all eyes were turned towards them. Compared with the magnificence below, with the bewildering colors of the papal court and the rich attire of the guards, the shuttered windows are peasant-like in their simplicity. Another window caught the eye. This was open and the sun streamed in on Raphael's priceless freeces and lit up the great marble portice.

Grim Preparation.

Grim Preparation.

Grim Preparation.

"Within there," said a papal attendant, "the rooms are all ready for Oreglia, the cardinal deacon, who will reign during the interrregnum." The same grim preparation is apparent on all sides. Count Pecci, a nephew of the dying Pope, wearing a straw hat and fiannels sat in the fire engine house, opposite the private entrance to the Vatican chatting with the firemen. Carriage after carriage drove into the court. All the cardinals and countless bishops and priests came to await the bulletin.

A small crowd of men, women and children of all descriptions besieged the door where the news was to be given out. From the castle of St. Angelo came the boom of the midday gun, and then the Palatine guard gave the signal for the anxious crowd to be admitted. Passing through the corridor each received a slip of white paper on which the morning bulleting was already printed. Intenty reading these papers, the crowd fleet.
